

I believe the FCC should not implement any proposal that would water down Indiana's own telephone privacy law. My experience at home has been much more pleasant now that I have been on the no call list. I used to receive five to ten phone calls some evenings and now I am only receiving one to five per week. I respect the fact the FCC is trying to do something about this annoyance at a national level. If it must be done, it should be at the same standard as our current law and not diminish the protections we already have in place.

Thanks
